Using Action Research to Explore a Drop-in Service at a Children's Centre Carol Marion Booth 2009
Childminder Brian Jackson 1979-01-01

Childminder (Routledge Revivals) Brian Jackson 2013-09-13 First published in 1979, this book looks at the subject of childminding in Britain at the time it was written. It is based on a national survey that was commissioned by the Social Science Research Council and on action to help childminders funded by the Wates Foundation at Manchester University, UK. Previous to this study it was calculated that more than one million children under the age of five had a working mother, but little research had been done into childminders themselves. This book evaluates the number and nature of the childminders in Britain that were looking after the nation's children in the 70s. It argues that parents have a right to choose to work if society can guarantee loving and skilled care for their children. However, the authors suggest that this was not the case at the time and state that childminders were in need of better governmental support.

Using Action Research to Explore a Drop-In Service at a Children's Centre Carol Marion Booth 2009 Children's Centres are a relatively new development. There is little published research available about their impact on improving outcomes for children and their families and about the role of the educational psychologist (EP) in Children's Centres. This thesis describes an action research project that was run in Children's Centre in the North East of England. The project explored the use of a drop-in service that was offered to parents and carers attending the Children's Centre. An EP provided this service and the purpose of the drop-in was for parents or carers to be able to speak confidentially to an EP about concerns or issues in connection with any aspect of their child's development or behaviour. The drop-in service was run intermittently over a two-year period and approximately forty parents and carers attended. Data to inform the research aims and questions were collected using a variety of approaches including: semi-structured interviews, records of discussions, questionnaires, research diary, audio and video recordings. The audio recording was analysed using thematic analysis and the other data were analysed by using patterning to look for themes or issues from the various data collected. Reflective discussions during the action research process facilitated opportunities for triangulation and respondent validation. The drop-in evolved from one where the EP waited for parents to visit them in a designated room to one where the EP attended the groups run by the Children's Centre staff. The latter model increased the uptake of the service. Another important factor in parents' engagement with the service was identified by staff at the Children's Centre. This was the need to develop trust between the parent and the EP. Although, initially, the service was for parents, the staff at the Children's Centre requested access to the drop-in service. A solution focussed framework was found to be a useful tool to guide the structure of the drop-in. A wide range of topics were brought to the drop-in reflecting Sheppard's et al's (2007) discussion about the types of issues upon which the parents were seeking support when they attended Children's Centres. The study acknowledges that the drop-in is only one type of service that might be provided by an EP and that generalisations to other Children's Centres might not be appropriate or necessary. However, the study demonstrates the way in which an action research methodology helped to develop a service based around the needs of the community, and facilitated the provision of a drop-in service that was valued by parents and staff in the Children's Centre.
